"Our rights as gun owners, enshrined in the Constitution, are not bargaining chips to be played in a high-stakes game of political maneuvering. These are foundational to our very way of life, ensuring that every law-abiding American can defend themselves, their families, and their properties. An attack on these rights is an affront to the very fabric of our nation."

You'll never miss on the street...

Posted on 26 September 2015 on precisionresponsetraining.com

If you are carrying a concealed firearm, and have occasion to use it in public on the street (in a Walmart parking lot, at the local gas station, in a Walgreens store) you are never going to miss.

No, seriously, you aren't. No round you fire will have a bullet that misses.

That's the problem, you see. In public, every single bullet fired from your handgun will hit something. You will not miss. You may not hit your assailant, but you WILL HIT SOMETHING.

That something may be a pregnant woman who was shopping. That something may be a 4-year old child skipping merrily to school one morning. That something may be nine other people hit either by errant shots or by fragments. Maybe you'll get lucky and only hit brick buildings – but since you are already having to defend your life, it already isn't your lucky day.

You aren't going to miss. Every bullet is going to hit something. As such, your practice needs to reflect the importance of hitting your target every time.

Now, this concept isn't new – but I don't really like the common "Every bullet has a lawyer with a 5 million dollar personal injury suit attached to it!" type of phrasing, because we do not want people too scared to defend themselves. We don't want people thinking "I'd better not do this because I might get sued" at the moment where they have to be making a decision to defend themselves.

We need people thinking in practice: I'm going to hit my target every time, and I'm going to practice enough to consistently hit my target every time. That way, if I need to use my gun, I'll do what I practiced so I don't have to think about anything but saving my life.

While yes, you need to think about your surroundings in a self-defense situation, that is different from being too terrified of possible consequences to act. We practice to hit our target at speed under stress. We use the thought "You aren't going to miss in real life – you WILL hit something." to drive our practice so that we have the discipline to hit our target under stress in a real-life self-defense situation.

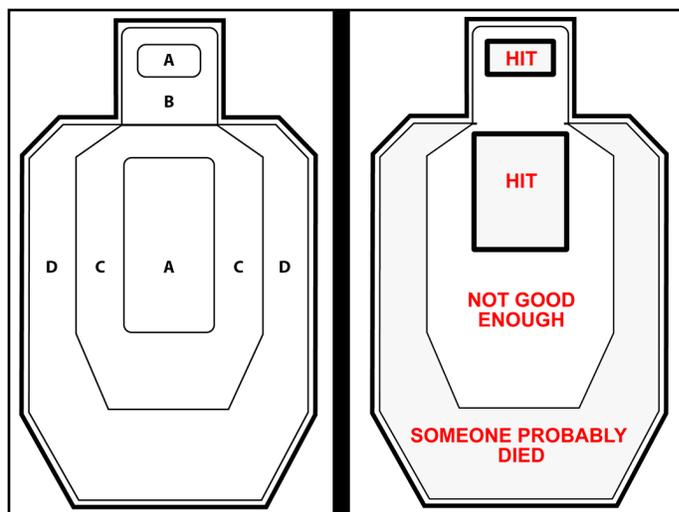

I practice differently with my competition gun and my concealment gun. (This shouldn't be a surprise.) When practicing with my competition gun, from my competition rig, given an audible start signal, I push myself in terms of speed and movement, to the point where I might miss the target entirely. I then dial it back until I get hits, get better at it, then dial it up again. I push myself to the point where I miss. When practicing with steel targets, I miss fairly often when I push myself.

When practicing to defend myself with my carry gun, from concealment, on paper targets, I have a small "sufficient hit" zone. Part of the rest of the paper target is an "insufficient hit" zone, and worse than that simply isn't acceptable. If my technique is bad enough that I'm putting shots into the "insufficient hit" zone, I need to fix it. My "pushing the speed" results in occasional shots into the "insufficient hit" zone, NOT the miss zone. I don't allow shots into the "miss zone" when I'm practicing to defend myself.

That's significantly different from my competition training – and that's just fine. I might be using the same target for both, but they mean very different things. I have a different mindset, I have a different mode of practice, and I have a different set of "what is allowed" for accuracy.

Here are the two versions of "acceptable hit thinking" that I use for practice (of course, I don't write the words on the targets I use, but that's how I think about it). Obviously competition shooting is on the left, and self-defense practice is on the right:

You aren't going to miss on the street. So make sure that the hits you get are the ones you want.

The Graham Combat Killhouse Rules

13 June 2016, by Matt Graham

1. NOBODY IS COMING TO SAVE YOU

Whether an event lasts a few seconds, a few hours, or even a few days – you have to work as though NOBODY IS COMING TO SAVE YOU.

2. EVERYTHING IS YOUR RESPONSIBILITY

You are your savior, so start working, because EVERYTHING IS YOUR RESPONSIBILITY. You are your security, your medic, and your rescuer.

3. SAVE WHO NEEDS TO BE SAVED

You are your own best resource to SAVE WHO NEEDS TO BE SAVED. Nobody wants to save your life more than you, so set yourself up for success by having the simple tools and knowledge to do so: do what you can with what you have. Recognize that nobody is in a better position to start saving your life than you.

4. KILL WHO NEEDS TO BE KILLED

Sometimes saving lives means you have to KILL WHO NEEDS TO BE KILLED. It has been almost 15 years since I first wrote “the more effective you are at taking a life, the more successful you’ll be at saving one” and nothing in the intervening time has changed my mind. Be swift, be decisive, be final.

5. ALWAYS BE WORKING

Mostly, ALWAYS BE WORKING. There is always something you can be doing to improve your position. Always.

POLICE YOUR BRASS!

What makes an expert?

Posted on precisionresponsetraining.com on 14 March 2016

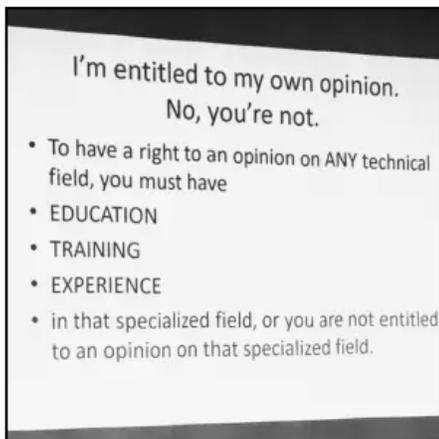

"He's a great self-defense instructor, he learned it in the military!"

"That firearms group is the best for CCW training, because they all have law enforcement experience. That guy teaches other cops!"

"He has 25 years of firearms experience – he knows what he's talking about!"

The first two statements above are flat-out wrong. The third is a non sequitur. And yet, people KEEP saying things like that.

If you go to the Instructor Development Class with Tom Givens, at some point in time during a lecture he'll discuss valid opinions, and who has them. His slide will look something like this:

...which apparently many, many people don't seem to understand.

There's something about current society where people seem to think that they are all entitled to opinions of their own, AND that said opinion is equally as valid as everyone else's opinion. They do this to doctors, lawyers, law enforcement – and it certainly appears in the firearms training world. Who hasn't run into "That Guy" at the gun store who is the World's Foremost Expert about guns, who will endlessly pontificate to some poor person about "the right gun for a woman" or "the best caliber for self-defense" or "you won't be able to use your sights under stress" or some other such nonsense? And if you actually contradict him, citing actual research, his response is "well, that's just your opinion" or something like that? As if his opinion and the actual research are equal in terms of importance!

Do you have an opinion about something in a technical field? (And believe me, shooting skills and self-defense training are two very technical fields.) In that field, do you have actual education (at a high level), formal training (by a recognized expert), or experience that directly relates to the topic at hand? No? Then shut up. Your opinion is meaningless. Seriously. Meaningless.

You might be right—but it isn't because you actually know, it is because you got lucky. The next thing you spout might be equally lucky, but it also might be pure nonsense because you don't actually have any rational basis for your opinions. (Hint: reading opinion articles on the Internet is NOT education. Having your friend show you how to shoot and then practicing on beer cans is not training. Getting into a drunken slap-fight once while in college is not experience.)

Example: Military training is effective for military purposes. It isn't self-defense training. Law enforcement training is effective for law enforcement purposes.

MOST of that is not self-defense training. And very importantly, the general goals which define principles which drive tactics in MIL and LEO training are very different from citizen self-defense. As such, MIL or LEO training and experience does not automatically qualify someone to have a valid opinion about citizen self-defense. (Or shooting skills, for that matter.)

MEMBERSHIP
NOW BEING ACCEPTED

RENEW EARLY!
DON'T MISS THE
31 DECEMBER
DEADLINE

A copy of the RENEWAL FORM is included HERE in this newsletter, and copies can be found at the Club and on the Club website, at <http://www.cpfqc.com/memsonly.html>

(Note that the form is two-sided)

What makes an expert?

Having owned and shot guns for 25 years is meaningless, because plenty of people out there SUCK at shooting and have no safety habits instilled, but simply have been lucky not to shoot themselves thus far. (Most people who say "I've been shooting for 25 years and..." don't actually shoot that much, and they aren't very good, either. If they were, that wouldn't be the support for their opinion that they'd provide!)

There are plenty of MIL, LEO, and shooters-of-25-years who are VERY good instructors of self-defense and shooting skills. However, the fact that they are MIL, LEO, or have shot a gun for a number of years isn't WHY they are good.

If you are looking for an instructor in a particular area, if that instructor does not have education, training, or experience (or some combination of the three) in THAT AREA, then their opinion about it is as meaningless as...That Guy in the gun store.

Which, I'll note, is why we have big-name instructors who say that dryfire isn't a good idea, that you won't be able to see your sights while under stress and should use point-shooting, that "fine motor skills will degrade" such that you can't activate a slide release under stress, and that putting yourself on a timer to test your shooting skills will cause training scars sufficient to get you killed "on the street" – all of which statements are flat-out wrong.

Anyone can call themselves an instructor. That doesn't actually mean they know anything.

Your opinion is NOT necessarily as valid as everyone else's opinion. The same thing is true for instructors. Every instructor out there who says something should not have their opinions considered equally important, because many of them have education, training, or experience in fields that sound important but are actually unrelated to the area in which they are expressing an opinion.

If you want to actually learn something, make sure your instructor has education, training, or experience IN THAT AREA. If they don't – then their opinion isn't any more valid than yours.

.22 Rimfire Snap Caps

Most people realize that dry firing a firearm is better done when there is a dummy round or snap cap in the chamber. In a centerfire gun, the snap cap prevents the firing pin from encountering a hard stop, rather than a relatively soft primer. In a rimfire gun, the snap cap prevents the firing pin from impacting the chamber edge, which would damage it if done repeatedly.

Unfortunately, rimfire snap caps are quite expensive and break easily, limiting their usefulness.

We've found a great alternative. Home Depot stocks plastic wall anchors that are a perfect fit in a .22 rimfire chamber, and they're only $3.92 per hundred!

Absent such action on my part, I hereby grant the Club, its agents, volunteers, sponsors, beneficiaries, heirs, and assigns the right to use my photographic and video image(s) in the promotion of the shooting sports or the Club in general as it chooses in its sole discretion without compensation.

I hereby agree that jurisdiction for any action pertaining to this release shall lie exclusively in Rockingham County, in the State of New Hampshire, and shall be governed exclusively by the laws of the State of New Hampshire, without reference to conflict of laws' provisions.
